For Kids and Adults Too!

I Make and I Am Made

Museum display for kids, especially those who are about 10 years old, actually make things easier for grown-ups to understand too.

Lately, we've heard people all over the place say the same thing.

That's why we decide to make an exhibition that everyone can enjoy, from children to adults.

Exhibition Highlights

1. An Exhibition for Everyone to Enjoy

Some of the works selected for this exhibition prompt us to ask ourselves who we are, while others give a visible form to creative acts like kneading clay, painting with our feet, cutting, and assembling things. Whether the viewers are kids, adults or a combination of the two, everything here is easy to appreciate.

2. Explanations That Are Easy for Everyone to Read

The explanations were designed to be readable for ten-year-olds, and also to be introductions for adults. Be sure and look at the fun titles, which immediately give us an idea what the work is about.

3. Slightly Lower Displays

The works are displayed slightly lower than usual to make them easier for kids to see. They also promise to give adults a different perspective and new insights.

4. A Roomy Exhibition Space

There are lots of chairs everywhere. This creates a leisurely viewing area for kids, adults or a combination of the two to sit in various places, and take a relaxed look at the works together.

5. Don't Miss the Museum's Masterpieces

The “Highlights” section is devoted to masterpieces from the museum. In keeping with the theme of this exhibition, “I Make and I Am Made,” we present a collection of portraits related to questions about who we are and our experiences with other people. Enjoy the suitably magnificent lineup of works by Cézanne, Dalí, Nara Yoshitomo, and others.

Exhibition Overview

When you meet someone, you change. When you play around with paint or clay, you end up with things that you never could have imagined. Haven’t you ever been surprised to find that you or something you made looks completely unfamiliar?

In this exhibition, we present works that inspire you to consider questions such as: Who am I anyway? What does it mean for someone like me to make something?

This exhibition is fun for kids, and as an introduction for adults. It is also fun for kids and adults to look at together. It is an exhibition for everyone.

Exhibition Structure

The exhibition comprises three sections: “I Am Made,” “I Make,” and “Highlights.”

1. “I Am Made”

This section focuses on the theme of how our “selves” are made by the experiences of meeting, dealing with, and accepting other people. These experiences might be triggered by interactions with our close friends or family members. Or they might also be inspired by coming into contact with a culture from another place. Encountering something unknown leads to new discoveries and helps make us better people.

2. “I Make”

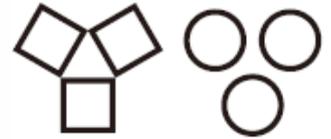

Now that we have become better people through our relationships with others, let’s turn our attention to making things. Making is an experience based on carving out a world from our surroundings with our own hands. At the same time, getting involved with materials that we cannot completely control makes unexpected things happen. Sometimes this introduces us to an unknown part of ourselves that makes us wonder if we really made something or not. For the “I Make” section, we have chosen works that make it easy to see specific creative acts like knitting, cutting, and kneading.

3. “Highlights”

The “Highlights” section was newly established to introduce masterpieces from the collection after the museum was renovated and reopened in February 2025. This display is a collection of portraits related to the theme “I Make and I Am Made.” The works, including pieces by Cézanne, Dalí, Nara Yoshitomo, Thomas Ruff, and Kudo Tetsumi, touch on questions about who we are and our experiences with other people.
